The Roman governor returned to fight Boudicca. She told her troops that the battle would mean the end of Roman rule in Britain.	As they marched towards Colchester other tribes joined them. They easily defeated the Romans in Colchester.	Boudicca escaped. No one is certain what happened to Boudicca next but many believe that she drank poison so that the Romans couldn't capture her.	When she refused they tied her and her daughters up and beat them. This made Boudicca and her tribe very angry, and they decided to fight the Romans.
The new Roman army was outnumbered but won. Many of the soldiers, and women and children who had come to watch, were killed.	The Romans continued to occupy England and Wales until the fifth century AD.	When Boudicca's husband died, the Romans wanted her land. They wanted her to give up her throne.	They continued to St Albans and London. The Romans sent more soldiers but they were easily defeated. Many Romans were killed.
