

Christopher Columbus

Christopher Columbus was an Italian explorer who was famous for discovering the New World. This involved sailing across the Atlantic Ocean, from Europe to America. It was a journey into the unknown.

Columbus was born in 1451. He had three brothers and one sister. His father was a wool merchant and weaver. Columbus lived in the busy port of Genoa (in Italy). Boys in his town were often sent to sea to make money for the family.

Columbus wasn't much older than 10 when he first went to sea. He had to learn how to navigate by using a compass, the Sun and the stars. He also learnt about the winds and tides. Life at sea would have been exciting but dangerous. The sailors would have slept on deck no matter what the weather was like. The captain and officers were luckier; they slept in cabins. The men sang prayers often as they thought it would keep them safe. The wooden sailing boats were constantly letting in water so the sailors had to work hard to pump the water back out again.

In 1476, Columbus arrived in Portugal. It is said that he had to swim ashore because his boat had been attacked by pirates. Others say it was because he had been shipwrecked. Whilst he was in Portugal, he worked as a cartographer (map maker) with his brother, Bartholomew. He also met and married his wife although their marriage did not last long. Tragically, she died shortly after the birth of their son.

The people of Europe wanted to improve trade links with Asia. They wanted to be able to send ships to countries like India and China to trade goods such as spices and silk. To sail east would have meant travelling around the continent of Africa. This was taking too long. The land route had also been blocked. Columbus thought that it was possible to reach China in just a few days by sailing west. Maps in those days made the oceans look smaller than they really were, leading Columbus to underestimate how far away Asia actually was.

Columbus needed money to make this journey happen. At first, he asked the King of Portugal to help pay for the voyage. The King said no. He didn't think the small, wooden sailing boats could travel that far. Many people laughed at Columbus. They said that the journey was impossible. Luckily, the King and Queen of Spain agreed to pay for the trip. In return, Columbus promised them spices, gold and new lands to rule.

On 3rd August 1492, Columbus set sail. Three ships set off on the voyage: the Niña (Spanish for girl due to her small size), the Pinta and the Santa Maria. The ships were crewed by ninety sailors.

Food was kept in the hold. This included things like salted fish, cheese, wine, water, biscuits, dried beans and lentils. The voyage took much longer than expected. There was no land to be seen and the food was beginning to run out. The men were worried that they would be attacked by sea monsters or starve to death. They wanted to turn the boats around and go home. To help keep the men calm and focused, Columbus offered a reward to the first crew member to spot land. The prize was claimed by a lookout on board the Pinta, who finally spotted the land we now know as the Bahamas.

On 12th October 1492, the men went ashore. They needed to find fresh water and food. Columbus called the land San Salvador. They sailed on to Cuba and Hispaniola (now called the Dominican Republic and Haiti). As this land was new to them, they called it the New World. People were already living there. Columbus called them Indians because he thought he had landed in the West Indies. Columbus claimed this 'new' land for Spain.

In 1493, Columbus arrived back in Spain. Only two ships returned. The Santa Maria had been wrecked on a reef on Christmas night the previous year. He had also left forty men behind because he wanted them to set up a camp. Columbus was hailed a hero. He had brought back new food and had also captured some of the native people.

Columbus returned to the New World again in 1493. This time he returned with seventeen ships. He discovered that the men he had left behind were all dead and the camp had been destroyed. People from Europe were beginning to travel over to America to start a new life. They treated the native people very badly; they thought they could convert them to Christianity. They were made to work as slaves and many died from illnesses brought over by the Europeans.

On his third journey, Columbus discovered South America. However, in 1500, he was sent home in chains after it was believed he had governed Hispaniola to make himself rich. He was later pardoned and released by the King of Spain.

On his fourth and final trip in 1502, Columbus spent time exploring Central America. He never did make it to China. Sadly, Columbus needed to be rescued during his final trip as his ships were leaking badly. Columbus returned to Spain as a sick man and later died in 1506.

Columbus was once thought to be the first person to discover these new lands. It has been estimated that 100 million people were already living there. It is now thought that Vikings made the journey hundreds of years before him in 1000 A.D. It took a man named Amerigo Vespucci to understand that the New World was actually a continent. America was eventually named after Vespucci, rather than Columbus.
